ANALYSIS

The WB-IDA has kept up its 'very good' transparency levels but has been overtaken by the Asian Development Bank and the African Development Bank as the best performing development finance institutions.

The WB-IDA publishes to the IATI Registry on a quarterly basis.

The WB-IDA publishes all indicators in the IATI format, barring capital spend and current project reviews and evaluations.

It performs well for all organisational and planning indicators as information is provided on all indicators in an open and comparable format.

However, it scores below average within the very good category with regards to finance and budgets as capital spend information is not provided and there is room for improvement in the provision of forward looking budgets.

The WB-IDA performs well on all project attributes but project titles. The titles provided on the IATI Registry contain many acronyms making it difficult for non-experts to use this information.

It is among the top five performers for joining-up development data.

Furthermore, the WB-IDA is among the top five performers for the performance component. It has started publishing results data to the IATI Registry and does comparatively well on objectives as well as pre-project impact appraisals. Project reviews and evaluations are not available in the IATI format but can be found elsewhere.

RECOMMENDATIONS

- The WB-IDA should ensure that the basics of its IATI data are provided, such as titles that can be understood by non-experts.
- It should make further improvement to its publication of budgetary and financial data to include capital spend and forward looking budgets.
- It should add project reviews and evaluations to its IATI publication and therefore make them comparable with those of other organisations.
- To demonstrate the impact of transparency on development work, the WB-IDA should take responsibility to promote the use of the data they publish: internally, to promote coordination and effectiveness; and externally, to explore online and in-person feedback loops, including at country-level.
